

Web Review (15 points)—November 23

Although public historians have experimented with online projects for some time, the variety and sophistication of those projects have grown exponentially in recent years. Monitoring the effectiveness of history websites is becoming an increasingly important task among the community of public historians. Identify and review one history website. Your review must adhere to the Journal of American History's web review guidelines. I will provide a list of examples of acceptable sites, but cast your net widely as you determine what kinds of sites qualify as historical. Reviews should be prepared as if for publication. You are required to post your web review on your blog in its entirety.
