Abstract

Globalization has not led to the reduction of distances that some scholars predicted decades ago. Rather, the accelerated technological progress and liberalization of trade and investment have increased the frequency and intensity of interactions across distinctly different local contexts. Multinational enterprises are embedded in multiple local contexts, which create both business opportunities and operational challenges. This special issue investigates some of these opportunities and challenges arising from this multiple embeddedness.